

COVID-19: PRESSURE POINTS: BUSINESS AND RESPECT OF HUMAN RIGHTS (GLOBAL)

Legal Briefings

The current COVID-19 crisis is putting businesses under unprecedented levels of pressure, in terms of time, finances and operations. Meanwhile, human rights within businesses and their value chains are at risk, particularly in countries where labour laws and social systems offer limited protection.

Businesses have a responsibility to respect human rights, deriving from international standards, domestic legislation and from their own human rights commitments (including through codes of conduct, human rights policies and related documents). Far from being a lower priority, this responsibility should be a key factor in a business' response to the COVID-19 crisis. This imperative has also been recently underlined by the United Nations Working Group on Business and Human Rights.

This post summarises the main human rights impacts that can affect stakeholders within businesses' activities and value chains as a result of the COVID-19 crisis. It also details some of the challenges that businesses may encounter and provides an overview of key recommendations for them to navigate this crisis and prepare for its aftermath.

VULNERABLE INDIVIDUALS AND GROUPS

Businesses first need to identify the individuals and groups, across both their activities and value chains that are most exposed to adverse human rights impacts during this crisis.

The table below sets out four groups of vulnerable stakeholders and explains how the COVID-19 crisis could have a particularly negative impact on their human rights.

EXAMPLES OF VULNERABLE GROUPS	POSSIBLE IMPACTS OF COVID-19 ON VULNERABLE GROUPS
	GENERAL IMPACTS	GROUP-SPECIFIC IMPACTS
Women and girls	Greater mortality rates Heightened job insecurity and higher rate of job losses Greater reliance on employer Direct or indirect discrimination Limited access to remediation mechanisms Absent or insufficient health coverage, access to health services, and unemployment benefits Poor access to COVID-19 related information due to lack of literacy or lack of access to information channels	High risk of COVID-19 transmission and contamination because of traditional caregiving role and overrepresentation in care / healthcare occupations Inability or difficulties to work remotely bearing disproportionately large workloads at home Additional unpaid responsibilities Increased risk of gender-based violence and abuses Overrepresented in non-core areas of a business which may be first affected by lay-offs or unemployment	Migrants More at risk of losing their jobs / inability to return to work Inability to return home / quarantined in places of work or high costs or health risks associated with attempts to return home Fear of being infected / fear of starvation / fear of arrest due to increased police controls Recruitment debts Possible changes to immigration status
Precarious workers (temporary, gig economy, seasonal, self-employed, informal etc.)		More at risk of losing their jobs Less likely to benefit from protective labour law provisions
Elderly people / people with underlying health condition / people with disabilities		Higher vulnerability to COVID-19 infection More vulnerable to illness Current working arrangements, including on-site and remotely may not be adequate for them or may increase risks of additional health issues

Other vulnerable individuals and group include: minorities, indigenous peoples, refugees, asylum seekers, inmates, people living in extreme poverty, and homeless people.

COVID-19 ADVERSE IMPACTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS

In addition to identifying any particularly vulnerable group(s) amongst its stakeholders, a business should also be aware of the human rights that are most likely to be adversely impacted by COVID-19 when preparing their risk mapping in response.

The table below sets out examples of adverse impacts on human rights resulting from the COVID-19 crisis. The specific sector or geographic focus of a business can heighten the likelihood of impacts on these (or potentially other) human rights. It is important for each business to evaluate which human rights risks are most salient in its activities and value chain so that it can identify and respond to these risks and work to minimise or mitigate any adverse impacts.

Human rights are often interdependent, with the fulfilment of one, being dependent on the fulfilment of another (or an adverse impact on one, leading to a consequential adverse impact on another). In addition, a decision taken at the highest level of a company can affect individuals, groups and other businesses along its entire value chain. A business should therefore consider not only how it can avoid causing adverse impacts on human rights, but also how its decisions could contribute or lead to adverse impacts on human rights further down the value chain and how to prevent and mitigate such situations.

HUMAN RIGHTS IMPACTED	SELECTED EXAMPLES
Right to health (physical and mental health)	Physical health: on-site workers more exposed to contamination and transmission of COVID-19. Absence or inadequacy of guarantees for the health and safety of workers (social distancing, provision of protective equipment etc.) Mental health issues caused by reorganisation of work (due to remote working, on-site work, adjusted working hours, multitasking, partial or temporary unemployment, loss of income, etc.) Lack of social security coverage or insufficient access to health care systems, especially in the event of dismissal
Workers' rights	Non-compliance with international labour standards (deteriorating working conditions, overtime, work overload linked to businesses' reorganisations, accelerated pace of work, reduced freedom of association and expression) Lack of access to information regarding health conditions and risks on-site
Right to an adequate standard of living	Partial or total loss of income for workers linked to the reduction of certain activities Dismissal (with or without financial compensation / unemployment benefits and social security cover) Increased risks of precariousness or even extreme poverty
Non- discrimination principle	Some workers are more vulnerable to job loss, loss of income, and are more likely to be subjected to working-time arrangements (especially if part of a more vulnerable group) Risk of stigmatisation of workers with COVID-19 or whose relatives have been infected Risk of racism and xenophobia against persons originating, or considered to originate from, clusters of contamination
Prohibition of modern slavery and forced labour	Amplification of the main causes of modern slavery (increased poverty / more vulnerable workers, large orders within short deadlines, accelerated production rates, etc.) Some workers forced to continue working regardless of health conditions and confinement rules (recruitment debts, fear of reprisals, various forms of coercion, etc.)
Right to privacy	Collection of data by companies (via websites and apps), including health data, at the expense of employees' / users' / clients' privacy Increasing requests from governments for companies to provide data in the context of the response to the COVID-19 and to trace the virus (monitoring telecom traffic, requests to telecom companies that can help mapping individuals, determining heat maps, facial recognition technology, machine-readable codes)
Right to information / Freedom of expression	Reduction or cut-off of internet speed impacting access to information and freedom of expression Increased risks for human rights defenders

KEY RECOMMENDATIONS FOR BUSINESSES

The responsibility of businesses to respect human rights (and the expectation on a business pursuant to that responsibility) is clearly set out in international standards and increasingly in domestic legislation. These include the United Nations Guiding Principles for Business and Human Rights ("UNGPs"), the OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises and increasing pieces of national legislation, including in France, the UK, and Australia and potentially also in the US, Germany and beyond. Such standards and legislation require companies to conduct a number of processes such as initial and on-going human rights due diligence, stakeholders consultations, resulting adapted actions, tracking responses and communicating on actions taken, including through formal reporting.

The UNGPs provide that the way in which a company discharges its responsibility to respect human rights may vary according to its operational context. The COVID-19 crisis forms part of the current operational context of all companies and therefore can justify a company adjusting the steps that it takes. For example:

- Some actions ordinarily require time, travel, consultation, meetings and inspections of the type that it is difficult to undertake under present lockdown conditions. A business should not simply stop taking those steps. Instead, it needs to think creatively as to how to adapt such actions in the current context and the months ahead.
- Because of the increased risks for human rights and increased vulnerability of some individuals and groups, businesses also have to pay attention to new risks which may require new and potentially enhanced steps.

The table below sets out a summary of the key requirements on businesses in relation to the respect for human rights, together with recommendations for how they can seek to fulfil those requirements during the COVID-19 crisis.

Collaborate internally and externally	Collaborate with Governments, international organisations and civil society, business partners and other companies (including from the same sector) in light of the systemic and globalised impacts of the crisis Pursue dialogue with internal and external stakeholders (including representative of workers and unions) Address human rights as an internal cross-sectorial issue: ensure coordination and cooperation between departments (procurement, audit, risks, legal, corporate social responsibility, human resources, etc.) and employee organisations. Consider creating a dedicated task force or using an existing one (such as possible task forces created to implement the French law on the duty of vigilance)
Assess risks	Identify, analyse and prioritise risks in a rapidly changing context (where new risks appear and existing ones are exacerbated) Conduct preliminary human rights assessments in the company's value chain through desktop review
Pay attention to the most vulnerable ones	Identify risks according to the people whose vulnerability is accentuated by the crisis Focus on the most precarious workers, including those in the informal sectors, minorities, women, migrant workers, single parents, elderly people, people with underlying health condition or disabilities, etc. Note that vulnerable groups are not only within the company but throughout across the whole entire valuechain
Anticipate and adapt actions	Seek to prevent and mitigate risks on an ongoing basis taking into account the current constraints Make major efforts to anticipate risks arising from business decisions that could harm business partners, especially those most vulnerable economically and which might exacerbate risks and adverse impacts down to the last link of the value chain (especially when adjusting payment conditions, volume of products and timing of delivery) Keep this in mind especially when considering amending, suspending or terminating contracts, including through force majeure clauses, when signing new contracts with employees and business partners Seek as much as possible to pursue contracts, honour orders, protect business partners Seek to reinforce and adjust remediation mechanisms (including operational grievance mechanisms)
Track and report	Document actions and consider how to track them during and after the COVID-19 Act with transparency: report internally and also externally on actions taken

POTENTIAL CONSEQUENCES

In a context where the actions of business actions are closely scrutinised by civil society, and where social media is providing increasing channels for negative stories to be published, the reputational risks for a company that fails properly to address human rights risks are significant. With the COVID-19 crisis seeming to increase our use of social media, the potential audience for those stories is only growing.

However, the consequences of poor human rights performance are far greater than only reputational. For example:

- Finance: Increasingly, access to equity finance (responsible and social investors) and debt finance depends on human rights and ESG performance (including respect of the Equator Principles, the IFC Performance Standards, and similar standards from development banks). This has been emphasised by investors during the COVID-19 crisis. An investor's decision to divest of an asset can also depend on the human rights record of that asset.
- Legal: There is a global trend towards legal actions (including class actions) resulting from companies' involvement in adverse human rights impacts and from related reporting. The COVID-19 crisis brings human rights into sharper focus and companies are at risk of being held accountable for any adverse impacts that they cause or contribute to during this time.
- Operational: A failure by a business to support workers, both in its own operations and in its value chain, during the COVID-19 crisis could damage that workforce and hinder the business' attempts to recover after the crisis. This is particularly so in the context of increasing calls for people and planet to be at centre of the COVID-19 recovery.
